Ii

I, i /ʌɪ/.
The ninth letter of the modern English alphabet, repr. the Semitic consonant yod, which was adopted by Greek as iota, repr. a vowel. In Latin the letter represented both a high front vowel (long and short) and a palatal semivowel or continuant /j/; subsequently in Proto-Romance it also represented a palatal or palato-alveolar affricate /dʒ/, into which the semivowel had developed. In the 17th cent. a differentiation was made in the Roman alphabet, the consonant being represented by J, j (in its origin merely a variant form of I, i in certain positions), and the vowel by I, i. In English the quality of the short vowel represented by I, i has not significantly changed since Old English, but in the mod. period the long vowel has developed into a diphthong with a short high front vowel as its second elem.: for this and other values of this letter see the Key to the Pronunciation. Pl. I's, Is, ies.

▸ III 9 Abbreviations: I. = Institute; Institution; Island(s); Isle(s). I (CHEMISTRY) = iodine.

— NOTE: The dot over the lower-case i is derived from a diacritic mark, like an acute accent, used in Latin manuscripts to indicate the i in positions in which it might have been mistaken for part of another letter. The same cause led finally in English to a scribal convention that i must not be used as a final letter, but must in this position be changed to y, though in inflected forms, where the i was not final, it was retained (hence city, cities, duty, dutiful, etc.).
